On the Vatican Negotiations

And Catholicism in the United States of America

This writer clearly recognizes the source whence this mission to the Vatican originated, and looks upon that as having given rise to one of the chief difficulties in the way of carrying through the negotiations. He says:

"The last, but not least, obstacle to Judge Taft's undertaking was the origin of the mission itself, which was due to the clever and patriotic initiative of Monsignor Ireland. This, and the presence among the advisers of the Governor of Bishop O'Gorman one of Archbishop Ireland's best friends, had the effect of raising the questions of persons, and the suspicion of personal advantage, on the part of the Archbishop and his adherents, which, I am sure, are without foundation, but which, nevertheless, aroused the animosity of the two parties which my friend in Washington called 'the Ireland and Corrigan factions,' who are as divided and opposed in Rome as in America. Of course, the followers of Ireland were for the success of the mission, while the others wanted to see the triumph."

This is enlightening regarding the boasted unity and oneness of the "one universal Church," which maintains a unity among its adherents much like that existing among the citizens of a nation that is split up into different political factions. But there can be no doubt that both these factions were agreed in wishing the Papacy to triumph at the cost of American principles.

This writer thinks that inasmuch as Judge Taft was originally instructed "to take up the subject tentatively" with the Vatican authorities, and as "a broad basis of negotiations, to be carried on at Manila," was secured, the mission was not a failure from the American standpoint; but he thinks "there is no doubt that the Church has lost a chance which may, perhaps, not occur again for a long time—that of coming to a written accord with Washington—while now her situation in the Philippines will be of the most difficult." He thinks there is strong probability that the friars will now have to establish their property claims one by one in the civil courts, which will entail enormous expense and will have to be done under extraordinary difficulties; and that, therefore, while the negotiations to be continued in Manila "will, perhaps, be more practical, the moral effect with regard to the relations between the Holy See and the United States will be quite different." The idea is, we suppose, that further progress in the matter will tend to the estrangement rather than to the coming together of the Papacy and the Government with consequent loss of influence and prestige to the Papacy. This remains to be seen, however.

The other article dealt with "Catholicism in the United States," to the wonderful progress of which it was stated that world-wide attention and interest was just now be-
